

AUTUMN

Now droops the golden-rod beneath its crown,
And gorgeous are the turrets of the hill;
Upon the sumac's breast are gouts of blood:
But weary are the winds that murmur still;
The sunshine dreaming lies, and now, at eve,
Grow shadows on the lowland, swift and chill.

By Beth Slater Whitson

From: Appleton's Booklovers Magazine
Vol. 6, No. 4, Pg. 448
October, 1905